Connecting with other families

Getting to know other families with children with disability is a great way to build your information and support network.

Every family raising a child with disability has travelled a unique journey, full of joys and challenges.

Connecting with other families who share similar experiences and who 'get it' can become a valuable source of emotional support and an important part of looking after yourself. Together you can share information and ideas, celebrate the joys and see how others approach challenges.

There are many ways to connect, so choose what works for you. You can meet in person, connect online or through a disability-specific group or association. Some groups provide information while others may offer emotional support or fun activities. It's worth exploring what these groups have to offer as you navigate your child and family's journey.

Joining a peer support group can help you feel more confident, capable and less isolated. Many families say it helps to smooth the road ahead and can lead to meaningful relationships throughout their child's life.

There are also many opportunities to meet other families in your local community through groups, libraries, events and activities which are open to everyone.

Playgroups

Playgroups are a great way for parents and children to come together and have some fun. Playgroups are inclusive of all children. There are also several disability-specific playgroups, including PlayConnect+ for children with developmental delay and playgroups with Auslan interpreters.

Working out Dads

Working Out Dads is a free online support program for fathers of children with developmental delay or disability. It is an established evidence-based program developed by Tweddle Child and Family Health. ACD has partnered with Tweddle to tailor the program specifically for fathers of children with developmental delay or disability.

Working out Dads is a six-week evening program run several times a year. It offers dads a supportive space to connect, share experiences and build practical strategies.

Bookings can be made with ACD when sessions open.
